obligations with more precision. The formal disconnection of church and state would not, in prevailing circumstances, achieve very much. The frank acceptance of the secular nature of the state would probably not, anyway, correspond with public sentiment. It would also produce some appalling consequences if only because the state itself has no true religious principles with which to replace the existing comfortable anomalies;—and the notion of a public debate about a substitute sanction, at the basis of the constitution, conducted in the manner of a referendum, is regarded as a dreadful evanescence.

But a discussion of the issues ought to take place within the church: a discussion in the light of the effect of religious establishment upon the legitimacy of the state. If the church's leaders then decide to do not like their real responsibilities, they have considered them in theoretical terms, they can always seek disestablishment. And if some on the public side of the question would rather not have an establishment of religious rulers, they can always console themselves with the thought that religion is not exactly the present church's strongest point. Genuine secularists can derive their comfort from the possibility that the Church of England may anyway come out within the decade to come.

Many are reluctant to face the cost of expecting them in action. It is a sufficient truth of the way in which we arm. But even the traffic
